VIDEO: TOOLING UP: Behind the Science of Spill Control

| Aug 01, 2024

Video Highlights

In this episode of MSC's Tooling Up, Toni Neary is joined by Bobby Ennis, general manager at Brady SPC for a discussion on absorbents and the importance of spill control.

As a seasoned mechanical engineer with a career rooted in the environmental sector, Bobby shares his experience at his current role at Brady SPC, where he focuses on creating advanced absorbent products for spill cleanup. He discusses the science behind these seemingly simple products, highlighting the meticulous research and development that goes into making them highly effective in protecting the environment and ensuring workplace safety.

The conversation covers various types of absorbent products, such as hydrophobic pads, color-coded for specific uses, and the strategic application of pillows and socks in industrial settings. Bobby emphasizes the importance of spill kits as essential emergency response tools, drawing a parallel to first aid kits. This video is a must-watch for anyone interested in environmental protection, industrial safety, or the innovative technologies behind effective spill management. Gain valuable insights into how high-tech solutions can transform even the most low-tech appearing products, ensuring a safer and cleaner workplace environment for everyone.
